

AFTER A 350-MILE RUN, DEAN KARNAZES CHOOSES A VERY SPECIAL SHOE

Ultramarathoner, author, husband, father,
Samuel Hubbard shoe enthusiast, entrepreneur, and (just barely) human, Dean Karnazes

If Dean Karnazes tells you he's going to run to the store, there are two reasons he might be gone awhile.

1) When he says "run," he doesn't mean quickly drive, he means run, and

2) The store in question might be in a different state.

The international media from Time Magazine to Late Night With David Letterman has documented the ultramarathoner's off-the-charts endurance accomplishments: The 50 marathons in 50 days in 50 states. The run across Death Valley. The many 200-mile relays he has run solo, racing against teams of 12. The running 350 miles without stopping. He's been written about, gushed over and chronicled in enough print pieces to stretch out for 26 miles, so you may think you have nothing in common with him. But you'd be wrong; like you, he digs our shoes.

"They treat my feet like royalty," says Dean. "I trust when I put them on, they'll feel great," he adds. "I'm not one to sit still, so whether I'm walking to meetings or walking the dog, it's essential that my footwear be comfortable." What are a few of his Hubbard faves? "Hubbard Free and Hubbard Fast for casual," he states, but confesses he likes the Tipping Point because he's "a sucker for stylish wingtips."

See? We're not all that different.
